The disease pattern "Pott's puffy tumour" describes a local frontal-bone osteomyelitis that arises from an external infection with consecutive subperiostal expansion. Symptoms may develop slowly or not at all with a mostly indolent protuberance on the patient's forehead. Symptomatic illness often indicates secondary morbidities. Here, we present a complicated case with intracranial dissemination.